ABSTRACT

A leaching chamber has sidewall perforations which slope downwardly from interior to exterior, and which flare inwardly, so that the smallest slot dimension is on the exterior surface of the sidewall. Mold cores having inwardly retracting slides are used to form the chamber. Thus, perforations are present down near the base flange of the sidewall, even though the base flange has an upwardly extending fin.